

contained by providing adequate prospects for the subordinate officers in them and to place all men admitted to the Civil Service cadre, however recruited, on a uniform footing as regards pay and prospects. There is now no need to maintain two separate lists of Assistant Commissioners, and the A and B schedules will accordingly be amalgamated into one list in future. The phrase really means nothing more than that the officers are given a gazetted rank—an object which can be achieved without constituting them into a separate class. The system of placing them in a separate class of their own is not based on any sound principle and it will be accordingly abolished, all the officers now borne on that list being treated as gazetted officers in their respective departments, the nature of their tenure (permanent or temporary) and their pay being regulated by the existing orders in each case.
